THE WISH-BONE.

Slender and sinuous, peephole bone,
We called it the future to divine;
Her hands it pat, the sun in my own,
Told that wish, and wish-bone both were

What did you ask?" whispered my Rose,
Looking up with eyes so true.
"I wished," I answered, drawing her close,
"The woman I wish'd look like you."

Her eyes as brown as a forest brook,
Her cheek as pink as a sea-shell's blit,

A hair brown hair with a golden glint;

"You're as sultry," she said, in a gentle tone. "Let me see; where are you wounded?" and she knelt once more beside him, for the man had sunk back exhausted.

"If—it—you will give me—something warm to drink, I will try to leave your house at once, madam," he gasped, vainly endeavoring to rise again.

"No, no, you shall not go," answered Mrs. Sanderson now, with warmth and earnestness. "Your white face is far from enough to soften my vanity against you. We women of Lexington are as tender-hearted as our husbands are brave. I will not turn a suffering man from my door, even though he be our bitter enemy. Lie still; you shall have your cup of tea,"—Augusta de Bubna, in Youth's Companion.

The ideal American Home.

What is the ideal home of the intelligent and refined American citizen?

You know the picture. It is not over 500 acres of land. One hundred in woodland, 100 in pasture, 230 in great cultivation, and the remaining fifty in proximity to the eight or ten room house. There is a ten-acre orchard of well-cared for fruit trees of every variety, adapted to the soil and climate, a five-acre vineyard, a kitchen garden of our own, separated lots and houses for stock and for fowls, and with the front yard thrown into mounds and laid off with sepulchral walls, with summer houses, and in which are found the choicest flowers and most luxuriant of vines. In one room, one of the most comfortable, is found a library; there is new books, magazines and a newspaper, and to which on the dullest of days the minds of the family can readily turn for communion with great authors. Do please the law exorcise under rose-bushes or through vine arbors, for persons named in their wills?—ever find them in such places? No, these do not breed crime, graduate or attract criminals. But they do inculcate and instill principles born in the bosom of God, whose voice is the happiness and harmony of the world. Were it possible to rear a child in a place without contact and contamination with the outside world, with no other teacher than the language of the garden, its life would be as pure as the prayer of an angel, and its epitaph with truth be written: No pearl ever lay under Ophir's green water. More pure in its shell than thy spirit is thine.

It is, however, not at all necessary to have so much as 500 acres to create an ideal home; nor the half, nor the fifth of it. How often do we find a master hand take hold of a few acres, and, as it were, by the touch of magic, change the otherwise rude and ugly surface of the elephant into the soft and silken spots of the leopard? The cottage home, surrounded by fruits, flowers and ornamental trees, arranged with taste, cultivated and pruned with care, attracts more attention than the costly, stately mansion without these although built by native forest monarchs.

And the boys? O, Silas, tell me quickly!

Rothen was wounded a trifle, but he is safe; they are both pursuing the enemy; and will follow them up to Charlestown to-night. But you, Malmay, where did you stay, and what?

"In the woods all night," sobbed Mrs. Sanderson, breaking down for the first time.

"My poor girl! There, there, we are all safe now. Come, make me a cup of tea,"

"Ah, you've got it all ready for me?"

"Wait!" as she caught sight of the tall figure in the red uniform that now staggered towards him from the doorway.

"I guess you'll have to whistle for your cup of tea in this house, Mr. Britisher!" said she, as she ran hurriedly out of the house toward the piece of woods half a mile or so away.

It was dark now and growing cool, then warm. Patches of snow still lingered on the hedges and in paths which the sun could not reach at mid-day. The wind whistled through the bare boughs, and she was chilled through when she reached the little hut in the woods. The baby waked, and cried, and his voice seemed louder and shriller than ever before. She hugged him closer to her bosom and stilled his cries quickly, lest some prowling British soldier should detect their hiding spot.

Flashes of fire and the sound of the excited voices of the men could be heard in the distance. With a prayer upon her lips for the safety and preservation of her loved ones, Mrs. Sanderson at last succumbed to nature, and lay down to rest. Tired and worn out with the fatigues and excitement of the day, she soon fell into a profound slumber.

It was late in the morning when she awoke. In spite of the discomforts and cold in her strange quarters, she had slept soundly through the night; the baby had been unusually good, and had not disturbed her. For an instant she could not recover her thoughts. Where was she and what did it all mean? Then a flash of realization swept across her dazed brain, and she remembered all.

She made her way at length to the edge of the woods and looked down toward the village. The fight seemed to be raging fiercely; but could she believe her eyes, as she gazed there with one hand?

She seemed to see the red-coats fleeing back toward the Boston road, closely pursued by the Minute Men.

"They have been routed, and are re-treating. Brave men of Lexington!"

she cried, proudly, as she watched with breathless interest the quick march of the enemy, which were driven before them like a flock of sheep.

It was growing toward sundown when Mrs. Sanderson decided it would be safe to venture back to her home.

Already along the roadside were to be seen the desolation and ravages of war, and when she entered her own desolate home there, too, the "British" had evidently "come," for a general upsetting of her orderly household was plainly visible.

Where, oh, where were father and the boys? Should she ever see them again? As she laid the baby down in the cradle, and lighted the candle to look about her m mightily, a deep groan started her. She looked over toward the spot from whence the sound had issued, and saw a man's figure prostrate upon the floor in the dark corner.

"Her husband did not speak."

"And you sir?" asked the officer.

"I am your enemy," said she, "but you have been wounded, by—what knows? perhaps one of our own blood?"

—with a thought of her own brothers, who were still down in Cambridge.

"You are not a bad man. I think, although you are a Britisher. If I may answer your question as I would like to, I would say simply: 'Good-bye, don't come this way again; we might not be hospitable another time.'"
